
From the Editors' Desk

There is always an excitement about anything 'first'. Naturally, we are excited about the first issue of our Journal called Review of Professional Management. Excitement is often followed by expectations.

Our readers, hailing from any walk of professional life in Industry, Business, Management and Government, may expect in each of our publication at least one research based paper, couple of articles, experience based cases, one or two book reviews and a residual section on a lighter side to get a little relief after serious reading.

On the other hand, we expect that our contributors will activate and create a definite form and structure of an interface between Academia and Executives, the former coming out with testable theories and hypotheses, while the latter trying to conceptualize and generalize their experiences, both enriching each other. In the process, wherever we are as reader or contributor, we all expect to learn from each other through mutual exchange and cross fertilization of ideas and experiences.

For a professional manager, we may continue to debate if or not Management is an Art or Science or scientific art or artistic science, but there is no debate on the issue that Management, Science and Technology, especially Information Technology, are inseparable in today's business world.

In the final count, we expect to promote this thematic issue in successive issues of our Journal. And all those, from our Patron to each and every member of our Editorial Board to our contributors to our publisher to our prospective readers who all have encouraged us relentlessly to make the first issue see the light of the day, deserve our appreciation.

Let all of us, in our respective professional quarters, live up to our expectations and let our excitements never die. It is an exciting world to live in, both academic world and business world or a blend of the two.

Welcome to our first issue of the Review of Professional Management.
